Human prekallikrein (PKK) is a glycoprotein released by the liver which can catalyze the activation of high molecular weight kininogens (HK) to prekallikrein (PK) and the activation of factor XII. Since the partial transfer of activity of human PK to active recombinant chicken PKK (tPKK) in an immunoabsorbant system demonstrated that PKK is identical to HK, these results suggest that PKK is involved in physiologic coagulation. The aim of the present study was to determine if PKK is present in the circulating blood of individuals who are not known to have coagulation disorders. Serum samples were obtained from normal individuals and PKK was measured

This activity was not present in the samples collected in citrate or heparin anticoagulant. In addition, PKK was not detected in samples collected in citrate
