National health insurance for all Americans is another form of bureaucratic socialism in the making, as Democrats slowly advance a new proposal that expands the government's power to force people to buy health insurance. While the movement to pass the ACA and nationalized health care started with the 1968 Democratic Convention in Chicago, it is again being pushed through political power and mandated purchases, resulting in an underground socialist movement, according to the Wall Street Journal. What started with President Jimmy Carter's call in 1977 to create universal health care in the U.S. has morphed into the new push by Obama and Democrats for the same goal. The effect of universal government health care, where doctors, hospitals and suppliers are all paid the same, is that doctors and suppliers are paid, whether they are needed or not. But if you don't like it, according to the Journal, you can get out of the way. Under the ACA, government employees, businesses and certain farmers are exempt from individual mandate. The Journal quoted a 2014 Senate hearing, where a government purchasing official said, "It was clear that certain companies or entities have been managing their practices in a way to exempt themselves from the Medicaid expansion and the new subsidies, that their lack of participation is not based on the merits of the new markets, but is instead intended to keep some firms' costs more moderate." The Journal quoted Obama in 2014 as saying "Let me repeat: No one can be forced to buy insurance they don't want." Of course, the theory behind the new government-promoted, federally mandated and controlled health care system is to socialize health care, which will be marketed to the American people. The drive to pass national health care has been underway for decades, and now the movement has lost a major supporter, as Democrat presidential candidate Hillary Clinton stated this week: "I think
