Photo Gear is a simplification of the entire Photo Access workflow. In my experience, working with stock-dependent materials was not particularly intuitive, so it's always been a pain to ignore the stock selection and work on my personal art. The New Photo Gear lets you easily adjust multiple parameters together at once. So if you want to work on your subject in Trump's office with a different color or exposure, as compared to the McMansion in the neighborhood, you can easily change those variables simultaneously. Even though you choose a subject, you don't have to open the source media or figure out whereabouts it's saved. You simply add a new layer and drag and drop the new Photo Gear file to it. You can then add filters, frames, location or keywords to your new subject. And then you're ready to go. You can also add text and other photo adjustments to your subject, as necessary. Call it a productivity hit, but you can spend more time with your subject. Like any time savings, you'll spend less time and creativity. But you may resist doing some of the tasks you don't want to do, simply because you're saving time. Maybe you don't want to open up the original stock file, but you do want to make tests with various effects. You can do that easier with Photo Gear, as you don't have to open the original file. You can just move, copy, and paste the asset to and from, as necessary. It's all about creating images. And as the webmaster of Screen Grade, I know how hard it is to get paid for the time you put into making great images. So I hear you when you tell me screens are hard to come by. And having just finished three major editorial shoots, I know what you're going through. But that's why Photo Gear is so great. You can work on your image anywhere, from anywhere. And no matter where you are, you can see the art from different angles, or zoom in to see if anything was left out.
